For some people, companion animals are much more than companions. This issue’s cover story (“Someone to Watch Over Me,” p. 34) explores how veterans’ hospitals around the country are using the unconditional love provided by dogs to help heal the psychic wounds of soldiers returning from Iraq and Afghanistan. And the benefits are mutual, as military veterans help rambunctious shelter dogs develop the manners that will make them more adoptable.

Among our usual mix of stories, you’ll also find a feature about the complex relationships between people and dogs in Third World countries, a Humane Law Forum on the thorny issue of adopters who give an animal to a third party, and a “101” Department explaining the importance of basic intake exams.

Beyond our pages, you’ll find tips galore at Animal Care Expo, set for May 4 through 7 at Disney’s Coronado Springs Resort in Orlando, Fla. Expo is the world’s largest training conference and trade show for animal welfare workers. It offers workshops on cutting-edge techniques, displays of the latest products in the field, and a chance for you to network with your peers and get reinvigorated about the lifesaving work you do. Protect Against Carbon Monoxide
I wanted to share with you all an important, eye-opening experience that happened here at our shelter. Our vet clinic staff smelled smoke and thought they saw smoke. I figured it was the heat kicking on for the first time here in chilly Massachusetts. It happens every year when the heat first goes on ... smells like burning for a few minutes.

Just for safety’s sake I called our fire department and asked them to come out to check our carbon monoxide levels. Immediately when they walked in, the detectors started picking up readings of carbon monoxide from 30 to 44 [parts per million]—when they should be zero.

Thankfully it was less than an hour from the time staff noticed it until the fire department came out, but carbon monoxide is odorless and colorless, so it was quite by accident that it was detected. The paramedics came out to monitor our staff as a precaution, and none of the staff monitored had any symptoms of exposure. After [staff were] out of the building for only a few minutes, [the readings] were back to zero.

So the lesson learned is to make sure all your buildings and floors have a carbon monoxide detector in them, and that they are working. We used to have one in our clinic, but the anesthesia machines and all our equipment started setting them off on a daily basis, so we removed them. We’ve updated our protocols and have moved machines around and reset/updated the buildings with new carbon monoxide units with fresh batteries.

The fire chief told me that the carbon monoxide detectors would have picked up a read-

Good Reading
The November-December 2010 issue of Animal Sheltering is one of the best issues yet. Three articles in particular were very interesting and helpful: “Whose Animal is it?” (p. 47), “Rescued from Squalor” (p. 22), and “For Better and For Worse” (p. 8). I’m still working on reading through it in between everything else we do here, but I wanted to let you know that your magazine keeps me up to date in all areas of sheltering.

Correction
“Once More, With Spirit” (Nov-Dec 2010, p. 14) inaccurately noted that Jackson, the Weimaraner/pit bull mix who traveled across the country on his way to a new home, was at one point scheduled for euthanasia. According to Joe Pulcinella of the Rancho Cucamonga Animal Care and Services Department in California, the shelter which originally cared for Jackson, the dog had gone through a training class, was getting lots of attention from volunteers, and was very adoptable.
